Community: The Secret Ingredient to Sustainability

Our members are committed to a sustainable lifestyle, and we know this will be made even easier in cohousing. And as the recent ECOS Endorsement shows, we're committed to being good stewards in our community.

We're pleased to be partnering with McCamant & Durrett Architects to ensure we're incorporating as many eco-conscious features into our design as possible. A sampling of these include solar ready homes, sustainable bamboo flooring, and generous open space to lighten our development's footprint on the land.

Beyond the buildings, we know it'll be easier to pool resources, drive less and further reduce environmental impacts while living together in community. A simple email out to cohousing neighbors can organize a carpooled trip to the movies, a tent for a weekend camp-out and collaboration on everything from birthday parties to holiday celebrations to canning the community garden's bounty.

Don't miss Katie McCamant's Oct 6th-Presentation in Fair Oaks to learn more about sustainability in cohousing!

Cohousing in the New York Times

Courtney Martin of Temescal Commons Cohousing in Oakland, explains why cohousing is essential in our modern lives (and don't miss her TED talk video below too).

Modern Housing with Village Virtues

"Working families in the United States have many struggles today: expensive child care, not enough time to cook healthy meals, disconnection from nature, a sense of social isolation - what the sociologist Robert Putnam famously called "bowling alone" - and more. Older Americans, a booming population, often end up segregated generationally and in dire need of care and companionship.

*What if there was a potential salve to all of these struggles?
One that was introduced to Americans 25 years ago, but hasn't yet gone to scale?"*

New York Times Article Online

"We can turn inward, lose faith in the power of institutions to change -- even lose faith in ourselves. Or we can turn outward, cultivate faith in our ability to reach out, to connect, to create."
